

HODL – With Crypto CFDs

“Hold On For Dear Life,” popularly known as HODL, makes sense during market crashes. Investors just buy cryptos and hold on to them for substantial periods of time, until the markets stabilise. This can be achieved with crypto CFDs, since they usually don’t have expiry dates. Traders can assume positions even in falling markets and close the contract whenever a good opportunity emerges. Shorting cryptos, which is usually termed as a highly risky method during bearish trends, can be done effectively through such derivatives. Blackwell Global offers 15 different cryptos for CFD trading.

The HODL strategy should, however, be used only for cryptos with a large market cap.

Should You Buy the Dip?

Buying the dip requires traders to time the market; a strategy that many experts consider challenging. There are significant returns if it can be achieved, but traders have to figure out when the market will bottom out. This strategy takes immense skill and experience, along with being well-versed in the use of technical indicators.

Trading crypto CFDs would obviously be a comparatively low-risk approach, since losses will be limited to a set price. Moreover, the value of the contract will increase if prices rise in future. The crypto markets have started on a recovery path in the third week of September. Bitcoin has been climbing steadily since September 18,

Summer Cryptocurrency Trends – Blackwell Global

FOREX BROKERS NEWS · BLACKWELL GLOBAL BROKER

Cryptocurrencies are notoriously volatile – but there have been some patterns and trends emerging over the past few years. The problem is that crypto prices are not affected by the traditional factors that move the forex market. They are influenced more by sentiment, emotion and mood more than economic factors and can experience huge highs and lows.

Last winter saw a chill spread through the crypto sector due to online advertising bans by some of the biggest names. However, spring sprung some good news, with several popular cryptocurrencies seeing steadier movement in a positive direction. This has certainly led to hopes for the summer.

The reality is that while it does magnify your exposure to the market and, therefore, your potential profits, it equally magnifies potential losses.

Trading crypto CFDs has proven to be a safer option than trading on exchanges, given that you don't actually own the underlying asset and therefore don't need to take on the worry of safe storage. Another benefit of CFDs is that you get to trade on margin or leverage.

In the simplest terms, leverage is an amount that your broker is lending you, so that you network, including the likes of Credit Agricole, UniCredit and TransferGo. Today, Ripple has the backing of some of the largest banking names in the world, which holds promise for the cryptocurrency seeing mainstream adoption soon.

Conclusion

There is never a dull moment in the world of cryptocurrencies. The usual geopolitical and economic events don't really impact the prices in this market, while rumours and speculations have the power to send a crypto soaring or plunging with equal impunity. So, how do you trade successfully in this seemingly unpredictable market? The only instrument that offers traders the opportunity to trade both rising and falling markets are CFDs. Little wonder then that crypto CFDs are rapidly becoming a favoured means of trading the crypto market.

Women are Surging Ahead in Crypto Trading...

The Global Crypto Press Association July 13, 2018

If you thought the finance sector was a man's world – think again – as it appears women are surging ahead in crypto trading; or at least taking steps to get noticed in this ever-growing industry. Women are taking more and more of an interest in both trading and the decentralised blockchain technology behind digital assets such as Bitcoin.

A recent survey of crypto traders revealed that 8.5% were women. While these figures may seem low at first, the increased interest in the crypto field from females could see numbers grow in the near future. Interestingly, a meet-up group in New York City called Women in Blockchain boasts an impressive 1,400 members.
