Market Sentiment Fluctuations: Greed or Fear?

CNN's Fear & Greed Index quantifies market sentiment, ranging from 0 to 100. Since November last year, the index remained above 50 for five months, during which the S&P 500 continuously rose. Starting in April this year, the index declined, and the S&P 500 also bottomed out and rebounded. Over the past month, the S&P 500 has hit new highs, but the index has entered the "fear" range. While the "market momentum" indicator remains at extreme greed levels, the "stock price strength" and "stock price breadth" indicators show extreme fear, indicating a reduction in the number of rising stocks and a concentration of funds in a few leading stocks, particularly in the AI sector. Excessive concentration of funds may lead to increased market volatility, so investors should be cautious. However, they should not exit the market prematurely; instead, they should make rational investment decisions after assessing the current economic cycle and evaluating various risk exposures.

The UK is heading for a General Election on July 4. With huge concerns around the UK economy, investors are widely hoping for a change and for the government to focus on fiscal discipline and reduce national debt. The impact of elections in a major economy can cause ripples through the global financial markets.

Here's a look at the election in pictures 📷
